Max Healthcare and The Learning Lab partner to advance capacity building and research

06 January 2026 | News

To co-create training modules tailored to the needs of healthcare professionals

Max Healthcare, one of the largest private sector healthcare services companies in India, has entered a strategic partnership with The Learning Lab, a Guy's and St Thomas' Hospitals NHS Foundation Trust spin-out, through the signing of a Memorandum of Understanding (MoU). The collaboration is aimed at advancing innovative healthcare capacity-building programmes and fostering joint research initiatives.

As part of the initial phase, the partnership will focus on the co-development of a tailored, first-of-its-kind training programme for nurses practicing in the oncology department. The collaboration will also explore future opportunities across other strategic medical specialties, along with avenues for collaborative research.

This partnership brings together Max Healthcare's extensive clinical expertise and pan-India hospital network with The Learning Lab's proven capability in designing scalable, high-impact healthcare education programmes grounded in NHS best practices. Together, the organisations will co-create training modules tailored to the needs of healthcare professionals working in tertiary and specialised care settings. The programmes aim to strengthen clinical competencies, improve patient outcomes, and build sustainable, locally embedded training capacity.

This strategic collaboration underscores the shared commitment of both organizations to strengthening healthcare delivery and clinical capability through international partnerships, with the overarching goal of improving patient care and expanding access to specialised, high-quality training globally.
